

The mystery of having one location but multiple address answers

Issued by AfriGIS

30 Mar 2017

A banner for AfriGIS featuring a map of South Africa with various colored overlays representing different administrative boundaries. The text on the banner reads: "A F R I G I S", "We answer WHERE", and "Because if you know where, then you'll know when, who and how." Below the map are three circular icons representing location, search, and navigation. At the bottom, it states: "AfriGIS is a technology innovation company" and "We give easy access to quality location information and insights."

Why one location has multiple address answers

We received many queries and had interesting discussions around this topic after the publication of our November 2016 Newsflash.

Based on the number of requests received, we have decided to present the same information again, in order to provide more clarity and further information on how AfriGIS can assist you to solve data management challenges.

Our country's history results in different sets of boundaries fulfilling different purposes and as clearly indicated by our clients, this can cause substantial challenges in terms of master data management.

Due to the misunderstandings and complexities around it, we wanted to enlighten you again regarding why they are different.

Hence the diagram below, illustrating why one location has multiple address answers.

AfriGIS enables you to make sense of the complexities, legacy and data challenges.
