Springbok fever has overtaken the country, as South Africans across the country put on their green and gold in support of the Boks in France.

Brands have also jumped on the Springbok bandwagon, swept along by the tide of support. But that does not mean all brands have got it right.

But one that has is Checkers Sixty60's message of support that features a rendition of Nkosi Sikelel' iAfrika.

The message, "We'll bring it home" features the wives of some of the players. It then switches to exceptional local talent vocalist Yonwaba Qetswana and pianist Luca Human, who start the anthem. They are joined by numerous choirs, conducted by choral conductor Andre van der Merwe.

Doing something meaningful and sincere

"We knew what was coming with everybody advertising during this time, and many brands using players in their advertising, driving service or product through that," says Louw Le Roux, executive creative director at 99c.

“We wanted to do something completely different, something that would stand out, but that was also more than that. We wanted to do something that people would rally behind, that was meaningful and sincere,” he explains.

They came up with the idea of doing a piece that would inspire, but initially client was a bit sceptical, given that the anthem is sung at every game.

“But what makes this piece different is that it harnesses the power of the anthem to create a unique rendition, one you have not heard before, and client agreed,” explains Le Roux.

The power of 1,000 voices

The agency worked closely with Carien Loubser from Brainwave Productions as director and the power of 1,000 voices was her idea.

“That resonated with us, as it gave a bigness to this whole event,” he says.

She contacted Andre van der Merwe the Stellenbosch University choir master, who is well connected to choirs all over Africa. And then with the help of a talent scout they looked at which choirs they can bring in to do this mass choir.

They found Qetswana through a video online.

Message of inspiration

The agency then asked themselves, how could they connect the message with the rugby itself, without using players and famous people.

The brand is also not an official sponsor, so they had to manoeuvre their way through, for example by not using the word springboks, which other brands pay a lot of money to say.

They invited some of the wives of the players to be part of the message. The message features Aimee Kitshoff, Anlia Etzebeth, Anastacia Mbonambi, Layla Kolbe, Juan-Ri Mostert and Gavanza Nyakane, and their children, asking South Africans to join them in supporting their men in green and gold.

The result is a message of inspiration from the brand, that client loved.

"As a proudly South African business and brand, we are incredibly passionate about delivering to our customers what they need, when they need it - even when that is, in these times, a bit of hope and optimism," says Neil Schreuder, chief strategy and innovation officer for the Shoprite Group.

"The message delivers a united message of support to the Boks," says Le Roux.

"We know how united the country is behind the Boks and we are proud of that, and our message is for them to bring it home. At the same time the Checkers Sixty60 message is that we will deliver to your home," explains Marius van Rensburg, chief creative officer of 99c.

He adds that this is a nice play on words that worked together.

"Checkers has gone all out to ensure our customers can get into the spirit during this year's Rugby World Cup tournament.

"Whether you show patriotism by wearing a pair of Springbok socks, throwing a braai with your friends, or waving at a Sixty60 bike bearing the South African flag, we want everyone to feel the spirit.

Checkers is behind our boys to bring it home again this year," says Willem Hunlun, chief operating officer of Checkers.

The brand also has new load boxes on the bikes, in a salute to the Springbok rugby jersey and the South African flag, sees each delivery comes wrapped in national pride with the line "We'll bring it home".
